Executive Order Holds for the Next Thirty Department Announces.

"I consider the reliance upon the militia for national defense an unjustifiable imperiling of the nation's safety. It would not only be a sham in itself, but its enactment into law would prevent, if not destroy, the opportunity to procure measures of real, genuine national defense. I could not accept it or acquiesce in its acceptance."

Sudden Decision.

That the two resignations were de ided upon suddenly was evident. Sec-Garrison, despite the many differences with the President, up to within less than an hour of the moment he was to have spoken before the United States Chamber of Commerce, had not decided upon definite action.

He even had dictated a speech which he tried to make conform t othe President's wishes and had abnounced to newspapermen that advance copies of this speech would be given out as soon as his stenographer had transcribed his notes.

The speech finally was transcribed,

The speech finally was transcribed, copies were made, and Senator Garrison's private secretary had them ready to give out, but as he was in the very act of doing so, another employe in the Secretary's office was called suddenly into Garrison's private office. A mo-ment later he dashed out with the order that "the speech must be held up for final perusal by the Secretary," delivered, he had written the note to President Wilson, resigning. It is believed that earlier in that same period he received the letter from the President in which the President finally declined to insist on his own views before Congress. The letter was received by Garrison some time yesterday. Garrison's answer was his resignation.

"It is evident," he wrote, "that we hopelessly disagree upon what I consider to be fundamental principles. This makes manifest the impropriety of my longer remaining your seeming representative with respect to these matters."

The attitude of Chairman Hay, of the House Military Affairs Committee probably was more keenly resented by Garrison than that of any other responsible Congressional leader.

After Garrison had completed his plan, which he thought would eliminate the two chief objection to the present militin system, he found the Hay bill actually entrenched the conditions to which he objected.

final blow that crumpled the Garrison continental army pisn was struck only a few hours before the Secretary submitted his resignation. President Wilson conferred at the White House with Congressmen Julius Kahn, Dan R. Anthony, and John McKenzie, ranking Republican members of the House Committee on Military Affairs, and at this mittee on Military Affairs, and at this conference the continental army program was practically abandoned.

President Wilson had been informed by Chairman Hay and Democratic members of the House committee that the plan was in exceeding disfavor at the Capitol. He was told yesterday afternoon by the Republican members of the committee that the minority is willing to co-operate with the Administration in framing a non-rartisan army bill, but Republicans would not like raming a non-partisan army bill, but Republicans would not line up for the

The President is understood to have asked the Republicans if they believed it possible to make the national guard effective as a second arm of the military establishment. Mr. Wilson was told by the House members that they deemed it quite possible to frame legislation that would "Federalize" the national guard and make it more effective as a fighting force than the proposed continental army.

with the departure of Congression Kohn and his colleagues from the White House, therefore, the continental army plan had its demise. It had long been ailing piece of legislation.

It is believed today that the conferences the President held with Democratic and Republican members of the House committee on yesterday and Wednesday contributed to the determination of Mr. Gar son to resign, in that these conferences represented a final exchange of wiews on the confinential army scheme, and the President was definitely advised there was no support in Congress for it. The willingness of the President to accept a substitute was apparently one of the things that aggrieved the Secretary of War.

Accompanied by a letter to Chairman Ben Johnson, of the House District Committee, recommending its enactment, the Commissioners sent Congress today a bill "to regulate the practice of undertaking and embaiming in the District and to safeguard the public health.

The bill provides for the appointment by the Commissioners of an undertakers and embalmers' examing board, to consist of five members, and the examination by this board of applicants for licenses to practice embalming and unlertaking in the District.

"The regulation of the practice embalming and undertaking is, in the judgment of the Commissioners, a proper subject for legislation," the board "It has already been recognized in forty-five States of the Union, and there is danger that persons wno are unable of qualify as undertakers and embalmers in the protected States will flock into the District of Columnia to ply their calling."

"We don't want to make invidious comparisons, but it seems strange that Secretary of the Navy Danieis, because he is a politician first and a Cabinet officer afterwards, has been able to get more out of Congress than any of his predecessors, while Secretary Garrison, one of the ablest men who ever filled the war portfolio, has been able to get nothing.

"Congress has turned down practically everything Garrison proposed. Why? Well, chiefly because he has refused to kowtow to committee chairmen and to transfer every army officer to a soft berth in Washington when request was made by a Congressional leader."

At the outset of his administration. Secretary Garrison had a partial break with Senator Chamberiain, chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, and Congressman Hay, chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee. More recently he has been partially in accord with Chairman, Chamberlain, but wholly at outs with Congressman Hay.

The portfolio of Secretary of War in President Wilson's Cabinet is vacant today because Lindley M. Garrison is not a politician. This was the way army officers sized up the situation today.

And by the same token if some of the committee chairmer, and other leaders of legislative activities "on the hill heard some of, the comment at the War Department today anent the Garrison resignation there would be some cars helly burning.

Mr. Garrison has the army with him to a man in his controversy with the President and with Congress over the preparedness program. There was not a doubt of that, judging by the sentiment expressed at the War Department today.

He always was bluntly honest in his dealings with the press. He would discuss every question in his own department with the greatest freedom. If he was talking confidence was never abused. If he was talking for publication the newspaper men could go as far as they liked, so long as they kept in reaching distance of the facts.

There was never any mystery about the War Department during the Garrison administration. If an officer was to be court-martialed the Secretary said so, and gave the reasons why. While his fellow-Cabinet officers in the State, War and Navy building were going around with rubber soles and heels, Mr. Garrison was striding freely at regulation army gait, refusing to believe that a Secretary of War had to be a diplomat or a politician.

Secretary Garrison has not given a hint what his future plans will be. Before coming to the Cabinet post he was vice chancellor of the supreme court of New Jersey. Previously he had practiced law in Philadelphia and Jersey on was the ablest and most popular

"It is unfortunate that Secretary Garrison should resign. I regarded him as one of the strongest men in the Cabinet, However, the President realized that Congress would not agree to the continental army plan and that it would be futile to fight for it. Secretary Garrison wanted to continue fighting for it. Congressman Thomas S. Crago. Republican, of Pennsylvania, a member of the Military Affairs Committee, said:

"The resignation of Secretary Garrison did not surprise me. I had an inkling from the Secretary a month ago that if the committee rejected his continental army plan he would resign. "The House Military Affairs Committee is willing to increase the standing army to the 135,000 men recommended by the department, or even more than that. There is not, however, a single member of the committee in favor of the continental army plan. Of course they are all agreed that the national guard as it stands today is not the second line of defense that is needed, but the members want to see what can be done to build the guard up."

Speaker Clark said he did not care to discuss the resignation of Mr. Garrison, as it was a closed incident and comment is now of no avail.

Points Out Evils of Militia Military Policy Because of Divided State Authority.

In a statement prepared for the United Press. Henry S. Breckinridge, who reoutlined his views on the army plans now before Congress, which led to his Garrison. Garrison, whose policy Breckinridge supported. The statement follows:

"It is inadvisable to build a military policy for the nation upon the State militia, because to rest the defense of the nation upon forty-eight little armies over which the National Government has not and cannot obtain control, is to tamper with the country's safety.

"False claims are made that the militia can be made a Federal force. The Constitution sives the State full authority over the militis. The State authorities can, without reference to the wants or needs of the nation, disband the militia or keep 100, 1,000, or 100,000 militiamen, as they desire.

effort willfully to fool the American people.

"Most of the pernicious opposition to the creation of a real national force of citizen soldiers comes from persons purporting to represent the rank and file of the militia, but most of them are persons having a selfsh interest, by reason of their employment in life, in seeing that the militia is the only recipient of support rendered by the National Government to citizen soldiers.

"My condemnation of the militia as a national dependence is a condemnation of the system and not of the personnel. "Nearly every disaster of the revolution and the War of Isi2 was largely due to dependence upon the militia system. George Washington's main dependence was the continental army, absolutely controlled by the Federal Government.

Evils of Divided Authority. "If a man thinks the army should be split into forty-eight parts separately governed, he must believe that the navy should be divided into forty-eight parts, each part governed by a separate State. He must also believe that the foreign affairs of the nation should be managed by each of the forty-eight State, according to its own interests and its own views; that the post department management be parceled out to each of forty-eight States.

The issue is fundamental and uncompromisable." should be divided into forty-eight parts,

Congressman Hay would not discuss personal questions and disputes affecting himself and the Secretary of War. He would not comment on reports of old feuds and differences in army policy but he declared that the House Military Committee will go ahea! with its own program of army reorganization. "Congress is the legislative branch of the Government," he said. "It gives due consideration to any suggestions or proposals from the executive branch, but by the Constitution, Congress is reserved the right to decide legislative question."

When he was asked to comment on Garrison's statement in his letters to President Wilson that the federalization of the militia and discord of the contiof the militia and discord of the continental scheme was "a sham, a mockery" for national defense, he retorted:

"General Wood, former chief-of-staff,

Senator Hardwick of Georgia said he regarded Secretary Garrison as one of the ablest and strongest members of the Cabinet, but thought his position on this matter "utterly untenable." He predicted Congress would adopt a "rea-sonable program of preparedness."
